My love of crossword apps on mobile devices is no secret, so I'm happy to see that Standalone, Inc. already has their Crosswords app ready for iPad at launch. The phrase just a big iPod Touch is getting tossed around a lot this week and in some ways Crosswords is a perfect microcosm of that – some of the same iPhone screens and elements are available like pop-ups and generally don't have the actual functionality that's available on the iPad version that you can't get on the iPhone – except for the giant screen. Portrait mode has enough space to show you a long list of clues, keyboards and in most cases, the whole puzzle without zooming in. The scenery is even better, giving you both horizontal and down clues in separate columns, keyboards and zoomed-in views of the puzzle. Naturally, there are plenty of features like hints, the ability to tweet your time and of course the ability to download dozens of different crossword puzzles every day from both premium and paid sources. Video demo and collection after the break! Photo: Pixabay (Pixels)For some reason, a lot of people believe that the ability to solve crossword puzzles is a talent discovered at the birth of a select few people. This could not be further from the truth. Crosswords are not an insular test of your vocabulary or intelligence – they are a learned skill that anyone can develop. Learning new skills is one of the best ways to make yourself marketable and happy, but... Read moreNo other puns or puzzles require pretty much your brain as a crossword. Experienced puzzlers consider not only the literally of each clue, but also similar to those they've seen before, frequently repetitive answers, syntax quirks, puns, cultural references– and, of course, the subject of puzzles. Unfortunately, this means that crosswords can be down to the point of not welcoming new arrivals. Everyone starts somewhere, and regardless of what your abilities look like now, here are four general strategies to help you improve. Do puzzles every day! The only way to improve at crossword is to do a lot of them, and the best way to do it is to work them into your daily routine. For me, that means solving a few puzzles from an ancient book of 365 Will Shortz crosswords before going to bed every night. My mother printed out Washington Post crosswords and chips went into them at breakfast; My friends who go to work by bus or train are diehard New York Times crossword app fans. G/O Media can get a New York Times puzzle commission as most folks' crossword gateway drugs for a reason: they are easy to find and have a built-in difficult grading. The second is the easiest, the seventh is the hardest, and the puzzles are in the middle of the seam up day by day, so you can choose and the ones that work for you. That said, the New York Times is far from the publishing house out there. The Washington Post, the Los Angeles Times, and Merriam-Webster also publish American-style crossword daily; If confusing crossword is your jam, try The Guardian. Some organizations, such as Queer Queer and puzzles for progress, will even send you original themed puzzles as a reward for nonprofit donations. Just remember that each publication has its own style – mastering the difficult clues that set the puzzle in a Saturday New York Times puzzle won't necessarily translate into a post word, and vice versa. Using the app if you really want to board your crossword game, signing up for an app, like this one from the New York Times, is a great idea. As much as I love them, paper puzzles just can't touch the user-friendly features you get with an app. You can easily check your work or reveal answers letter by letter, instead of accidentally peeking at the whole solution. This clue demystifies just enough to make them viable, which is exactly what you want. Also, most applications time your work, which makes it easy to measure your progress. But really, the biggest advantage is accessibility: carrying thousands of digital puzzles in your pocket makes it easy to do a lot of puzzles. Knowing when and how to CheatCheating is a sensitive topic among crossword enthusiasts, but there's no denying it has its place. Crossword should be fun, and constantly banging my head against the same wall, praying for a different result, not my idea of fun. Besides, frustration is a bad teacher; Unless you have serious competitive puzzle aspirations, stubbornly refusing to seek answers or check your work will get you nowhere. A lot of games require a big investment in time - at least, if you want the best equipment, ... A little strategic fraud can guide you through even the most difficult puzzles. The app makes this super easy: just check or reveal each letter only by one until you can solve a particularly annoying clue. This gives you just enough information to (mostly) hack it on your own, which in turn makes the answer more likely stick to your memory. Paper puzzles make strategic fraud a little harder, but thanks to the internet, not much. If you're stuck on a printed crossword, Google's entire clue in quotes. Framing your search around clues rather than, say, how many letters you have to work with will help you understand what the clues want from you. Over time, you'll find yourself needing less and less help to solve puzzles that would previously be real stumps. Learn Up! You are serious about crossword mastery, the Internet is full of like-for-like people who love to help. A blog like Rex Parker is a great place to start. He solves New York Times puzzles every day, so The difficulty to puzzle others from that day of the week, and break the pair of key clues/answers in a short post.
